

Creating the future we want

To have a better future is to have a place where there are no worries about war, loss of jobs, no more living in the streets, and no more borrowing money from other countries.

One way we could help homeless people is by making shelters for those who need it. Creating jobs for them doesn't have to be in an office. They could pick up trash from the side of the streets. Just give them the tools. As they get their education, they could finally get a good job, and go on with their life. If they don't want to do this, then we just cannot have lazy people in this country. The government can't have people who are lazy.

When we go to war this is what happens: we start to spend a lot of money, we start worrying about the soldiers who are going to die, and then we just start having more problems.

We need to save the economy from breaking down. The economy affects everyone. We should stop wasting so much food and resources. There are wasteful stores in the country. Just because of something being ripped or scratched, they throw it away. One time, I saw a bag of chips being thrown away because it was crunched up. They could have used the small pieces for samples. To me it was just throwing money away. We waste fuel. We need more metro buses, and buses to take kids to school.

The police are sometimes not doing what they are supposed to do. A guy was driving with a stolen truck, and no one did anything. A group of kids were stealing a cart from a store. I told the police, and they just acted like I was crazy. There was a video on YouTube about a bunch of police jumping a guy in front of a camera. It was horrible. What the government needs to do is train better police officers, and put them on the streets. This will give us a better future.

Brian Navarro, 8th Grade, RYSS